I recently received this email from a startup:

We're a startup in San Francisco looking to launch a 5-page website this October. We would deliver all wireframes, web content, and design PSDs. We just need a front-end pro to develop the site. While the site is straightforward, we do have high dev requirements:

- lightweight site that loads quickly
- use HTML+CSS, only use JS when absolutely needed
- entire site to be coded using Bootstrap3

I wish everyone in the world would blog.

Did you solve a tricky user interface problem today? I'd love to read about the options you considered and why you picked the one you did.

Did you use some technology that you never used before today? I'd love to read about why you avoided it at first and why you came around.

Did you eat at a great restaurant this week? I'd love to read about what you ordered and what it was like there.

Did you subscribe to a new podcast recently? I'd love to read about why you chose to subscribe and your review of it.

Did you buy a board game recently? I'd love to hear how your first time playing it went.

I enjoy living vicariously through you, even for a moment. Give blogging a shot, I bet you won't regret it.

The CSS-Tricks License

SUPER IMPORTANT LEGAL DOCUMENT

I don't give two hoots what you do with any of the design or code you find here.

Actually, I do. I hope you take it and use it, uncredited, on a super commercial website and get wicked rich off it. I hope you use it at work and your boss is impressed and you get a big promotion. I hope it helps you design a website and that website impresses somebody you think is super hot and you get married and have smart, chill babies. I hope you use the code in a blog post you write elsewhere and that website gets way more popular and awesome than this one.

If you feel like telling me about it, cool. If not, no big deal. If you feel better crediting it, that's cool. If not, don't sweat it.

If you copy an entire article from this site and republish it on your own site like you wrote it, that's a little uncool. I won't be mad at you for stealing, I just think you're better than that and want to see you do better. I'm not going to come after you though. I'd rather play ball with my dog. The only time I'll be mad at you is if you go out of your way to try and hurt me somehow. And again I probably won't even be mad, just sad. Unless I'm having a bad day too, in which case I apologize in advance for my snarky replies.

I want the web to get better and being all Johnny Protective over everything doesn't get us there. I understand other people feel differently about this and might have semi-legit reasons for protecting certain code, design, writing, or whatever. I work on some closed-source projects myself. CSS-Tricks isn't one of them. Go nuts.

I recommend using development, and based learning is li price.

Best viewed at @2x.

I've been experimenting a lot lately with mobile forms. Left aligned, top aligned, placeholder text only, etc. for client projects and personal projects.

Placeholder text works great for a simple username and password form, but not so much when there is more information. It's easy to forget which field is which once you've typed into all of the inputs.

If you opt for left aligned fields always exposed you end up with much less space. And space on mobile is precious. If top aligned fields are always exposed, it makes the vertical height grow very quickly.

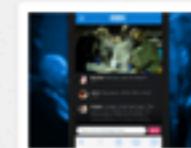

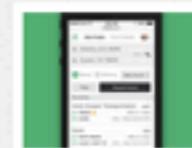

This idea combines the best of both worlds with placeholder text and top aligned text. Only the placeholder text is showing by default, so there is a nice, clean and readable

About the PHP Version of Pattern Lab

The PHP version of Pattern Lab is, at its core, a static site generator. It combines platform-agnostic assets, like the Mustache-based patterns and the JavaScript-based viewer, with a PHP-based "builder" that transforms and dynamically builds the Pattern Lab site. By making it a static site generator, the PHP version of Pattern Lab strongly separates patterns, data, and presentation from build logic. The PHP version should be seen as a reference for other developers to improve upon as they build their own Pattern Lab Builders in their language of
